If everything stops when you stop—what exactly have you built?

Most founders think they have a time problem.

They buy planners. They wake earlier. They get ruthless with the calendar, and none of it holds — because it was never a time problem. It is a structure problem.

There is a difference between being busy and being load-bearing. Busy means your day is full. Load-bearing means the whole thing falls down when you step away.

This is a short book about the second one: why capable people become the narrowest part of their own business, why it feels like competence while it happens, and what to hand over first.

"You willingly become the bottleneck."

Five chapters, five exercises, and one assignment you can finish this week.

Major Dream Williams was born in New York City, raised in The Bronx and Mount Vernon, and shaped by a Jamaican immigrant family. Founder of AMA Solutions Corp and architect of Foundry OS, he builds systems organised around one principle: ownership over dependency.
